I see what you mean, but I don't see much value in an acorn. It's just a seed, isn't it?

I completely understand your skepticism. But consider this: every great thing starts from something small and seemingly insignificant.

Look, I get the metaphor, but I still feel like this is just a gimmick. An acorn won't really amount to anything for me. It's hard for me to justify spending anything on something so trivial.

I respect your point of view. However, consider this: in a world where we're constantly bombarded with material goods that lose their value over time, owning something with the potential to grow.

I appreciate your enthusiasm, but I'm still not convinced. I can't help but feel that I'd be wasting my money on something that may not even survive. Why invest in a seed when there are so many other ways to spend my money?

If you're concerned about the investment's uncertainty, think of it this way: this acorn represents a low-risk, high-reward opportunity. The cost is minimal compared to the potential benefits it can bring.

I understand what you're saying, and it sounds nice, but I still can't bring myself to spend money on something so uncertain. I can't see how it would really benefit me in the long run.

I completely understand your hesitation, and it's smart to be cautious. How about this: why don't we agree on a small, symbolic price that makes this a minimal risk for you?
